RATIONALE

Rationale for Amendment 1

Deciding the next host earlier in the year is a huge plus for getting a head start on planning. But forcing an immediate handover of all social media accounts really puts the outgoing team in a tough spot. The current host needs that buffer until the end of the summer break (meaning right before the next odd semester starts) to properly roll out all their post-event content like wrap-up videos and photos. Delaying the handover lets the old team finish their tenure cleanly and keeps the pages active with good content. This also takes the pressure off the new host, so they aren't pressured to scramble and post random filler content while they’re just starting to organize the next edition.

Rationale for Amendment 2

The rules already make it very clear that an IIT's identity can't be revealed to the judges. But right now, there’s a massive loophole with online code repositories like GitHub. If a team makes their codebase public before the official results are out, it completely ruins the blind grading process because anyone can just trace the solution back to them. Since this basically leaks the code and the team's identity to everyone, including the judges, we need a hard-line fix. A strict 100% penalty acts as an actual deterrent to stop teams from doing this, keeping the competition genuinely fair and anonymous.
